

Museum/Organizations/Special Collection: Resources in Vermont

The following museums, organizations, and special collections are available to students working on History Day research. Check the websites for hours and contact information. It is always a good idea to call ahead to ensure the availability of materials and the assistance of research librarians.

The best way to find primary sources on local topics relating to a less documented event is to go to the town clerk's office, the local library, or the local historical society of the community in which the event occurred. You will find many important documents such as birth certificates, marriage licenses, death records, diaries, photographs, and other primary sources related to your topic. If your topic focuses on a more recent event, you may be able to conduct an oral history with someone who experienced the event.

For a complete listing of the local historical societies in the state, visit the Vermont Historical Society website at: <https://vermonthistory.org/local-vermont-historical-societies-and-museum-directory>
